

Understanding TV Upfronts

Understanding Television: Upfronts

One of the rules in media literacy is that every medium has its own language. And never is that more true than in TV.

The word “upfront” has been around quite a while. And even though there is an explanation/definition below, the actual meaning has started to change. (The phrases NEWFRONT and ALLFRONT are being used now because of the changing nature of the industry.)

Change is in the air because traditional TV and cable has some company.

And that company comes in the form of Hulu,

Netflix, Amazon and many others which are producing and releasing new programming outside the traditional rules, boundaries

(and calendars) of mainstream TV.

What are upfronts? “when advertisers have a chance to buy ad time on the network up front or before a season begins. It’s this time frame that the TV ad time is sold at a discounted rate.” (Source)

“The (broadcast and cable TV’s) presentations (to advertisers) are really only the start of the upfront process. Typically, after the networks make their presentations, the sales executives take over, beginning negotiations with (ad) agencies, who are bargaining on behalf of marketers, about buying commercial time in advance for the coming season. (That is how “upfront” gets its name, as the dealing happens ahead of time.)

The New York Times offers this explanation of this annual event:

The word “upfronts” is shorthand for an annual rite of passage for television networks and the industry that operates in orbit around them.

It generally refers to three activities:

- No. 1: The unveiling of new television network schedules
- No. 2: The cajoling of advertisers by the networks
- No. 3: The selling of billions of dollars in advertising time
“What are upfronts and what do they have to do with renewed TV shows?”

Related: TV Ratings

Upfront News & Resources:

Ad Age	AdWeek	Broadcasting/Cable	Cynopsis
Deadline	Hollywood Reporter
MediaPost	MediaVillage	MultiChannel News	New
York Times	Variety	Wall St Journal	